

As Katarna approached the mouth of the yawning cave, she heard the gushing river, which was as fast as a cheetah, raced across the intoxicating land. Slowly and carefully, she trembled over into the eerie, dark mist before she could plan her treacherous journey.

With sweat pouring down Katarna's face, she noticed the crystal clear cobwebs hanging from the bloody ceiling above. When she took one step further, the ground shook and the walls crumbled it was like an earthquake. A few metres away from Katarna, was a sign wrote in blood saying TURN BACK NOW! She could now taste her spit and heard peculiar voices praising her to go back. At the side of her lay rotten decaying flesh getting more gruesome and more gruesome as the seconds went by.

Every step she took into the cave, it plunged into complete darkness. Was this the end? Would she make it out alive? She froze. Is there something in the mysterious mist? Then she saw it. . .