

Deep in the Amazon rainforest.

As Tepui wandered deeper into the rainforest, he experienced wondrous sights.

First as he entered the rainforest, he came into the forest floor. As the river Amazon snaked its way through some rocks, cobwebs sparkled iridescently with raindrops. Very, very, very slowly, an anteater came to get a sip of water and strolled back again.

Suddenly, a black rosette spotted jaguar peered out of a bush to find some prey to eat. Stealthily, the jaguar hid in long grass and pounced at a blue morpho butterfly. All of a sudden, another jaguar padded along a branch and stared at the other one.

High in the canopy, a toucan was flying from tree to tree. A few trees away from the toucan a three toed sloth was happily sleeping with a baby sloth on its back. Just above the sloth was a spider monkey messing with its buddy. Suddenly the toucan swooped down and grabbed a fish out of a lake.

Up at the top, where the emergent layer sat, fluffy looking clouds had trees poking out of them. The humid misty damp air made the rainforest warm but wet.

Back on the forest floor, luscious green plants stood tall. One of the plants was called a Venus fly trap which caught flies. Lay in the lake, Amazon water lily's floated down the stream.
