

Deep in the Amazon rainforest

As Jessica quietly wandered deeper into the Amazon rainforest, she experienced some incredible sights. She could feel the steamy mist on her face which rose from the ground.

High above her, in the emergent layer, a flock of colourful macaws streaked majestically through the red sky, whilst melodious notes rang through the forest. Just below the clouds, the birds were making shapes in the sky.

Below the macaws, the tops of the trees stood like giants and swayed in the breeze whilst coiled vines twisted around them. Moss like algae covered them and birds perched on the branches.

Not far from the emergent layer, a mysterious creature appeared... It was a tree porcupine and on it, it had spikes as sharp as knives and had rough brown skin which covered its whole body. It had been spying and stalking the animals below.

All around the rainforest, there were fragrant flowers which smelt of perfume. Below the palm trees, the Venus fly trap awaited silently, ready to snap on anything that came past it. There was a plethora of plant life: Bromeliad flowers, which were vibrant and pink, purple and orange bird of paradise flowers, and orchids dangled in the air.
