

Deep in the Amazon rainforest

As Caelan wandered deeper into the humid rainforest, he experienced wondrous sights...

Under his feet, dead leaves and exposed gnarled roots smothered the floor. Vivid green vines dangled like ornaments suspended from the soldier-like trees. A couple of stems away from the vines, a blood red Venus fly trap was ready to snap on its prey.

Hidden in the dappled light and shadows of the understory, was a jaguar. Its arched, muscular back was covered in black rosettes amongst his yellowish brown fur. Stealthily, he stalked his unlucky prey. He gave it a guttural snarl.

Lurking in the snaked river Amazon, a swarm of vicious piranhas ravenously darted about in the rapid river. In their mouths', were razor sharp, serrated teeth, which were stained red with blood.

A couple of trees above the river, swinging from tree to tree, was a tree porcupine. The porcupine, whose spikes were as sharp as knives, scampered over to the other porcupines. Together they squealed a high pitch tune.

High above the emergent, whose trunks are 60 metres in height, was a macaw. The macaw, whose feathers gleamed red, flew to the rest of his flock. As the macaws flew over fragrant flowers on trees full of pungent sap, they streaked the sky red. Whist they flew, they tweeted a melodious tune which was as sweet as a toffee.

By Nathan