

Teaching Reading Comprehension

A Framework for introducing a text:

Each time a new text is introduced (fiction or non-fiction - in any area of the curriculum) Ask the following questions:

Text level

- Who wrote this text?
- Who was it written for?
- Why was it written? (What is the purpose)
- How is the text organised? (Look at the words that are used (formal/informal) - and the layout - pictures? Bullet points? Glossary? Headings? Sub-headings? Diagrams? Paragraphs? Etc)
- What kind of text is this? (Is it instructions, a report, persuasive writing, an explanation, information or does it contain elements of more than one genre - How do we know? What features are present to confirm this?)

Sentence Level

- What types of sentences are used i.e. statements, questions, orders, and exclamations?
- What is the structure of the sentences i.e. short sharp, complex, list sentence etc. - and what effect do these create in the text?
- What tense is it written in - past, present, future?
- Which Person - first, second, third.
- How is punctuation used - commas, exclamation marks, ellipses etc?

Word Level

- Vocabulary choices, technical or specialist vocabulary
- Use of word play i.e. alliteration, metaphor, rhyme, personification (effects created by using these)
- Have idioms (e.g. over the moon, see the light) or slang been used?
- Are there deliberate misspellings?

Why were these choices made by the writer to achieve his or her purpose?

How successful is this piece of text in achieving its purpose?

What is your response to this piece of text?

The importance of text interrogation

Interrogate to demonstrate:

The text is interrogated in literacy as a model at the start of teaching a particular genre to show what it should look like or sound like when it is read out. It is dissected in order to identify the features that should be included to achieve the purpose of that particular type of writing.

The text could also be used as a comprehension task for that week in order to reinforce the link up reading skills with the skills being taught in writing e.g. persuasive writing and questions on authorial technique.

Interrogate to consolidate:

The text is interrogated in other areas of the curriculum to identify and practise what they have learnt and to put their learning into context. In R.E. they may need to write a thank you letter for a church visit, in History to collate and record information about Egyptian pyramids and in science to record information about the method and results of experiments.

The text could also be used as a comprehension task for that week to link up topic work with reading skills e.g. a report about Egyptian life and questions on format of text.

Interrogate to assimilate:

The text is interrogated in all areas of the curriculum to ensure that the content has been thoroughly understood. It teaches children to look more closely and carefully at individual sections of the text to find clues, facts and opinions.

Interrogation of text in comprehension lessons teaches children how to find the answers to more difficult questions involving inference, deduction and evaluation.

Showing children the finished article lets them know what their work should look like or sound like. Then, by dissecting the text to analyse and investigate how it is put together and what is used to create the different effects, enables the children to copy those effects using their own ideas with more success. It is invaluable to sentence work because the children can pick out different sentences and understand why they are used in a particular place to create an effect. The more they see the sentence types being used in a particular way the more confident they will become at using them in their own writing in a similar way.

Important teaching points

1. It is vital that in reading comprehension lessons children are exposed to the full range of texts across the year.
 - Whole novel
 - Short stories
 - Poetry
 - Play script
 - All non-narrative genres

A simple way of ensuring this occurs is to use the same text being used as a model for writing for the reading comprehension lessons too.

2. Vocabulary should extend the children's knowledge and must be explicitly taught in the context of the text.
3. Each question type should be taught throughout the year on a weekly basis. The question type should be chosen depending upon the genre being taught that week. Also, experience of answering a variety of question types should be given regularly to ensure that the children can apply the skills they have learnt.
4. Reading comprehension should be taught through guided reading sessions where general reading strategies and comprehension skills are taught. This is usually as a whole class lesson.
5. Children need to be aware of how many marks a question is worth. This will help them to know the number of different points they will have to make in their answer.
6. Children should never copy chunks from the text. Instead, they must clearly explain in their own words and support answers when required with quotes.
7. When explaining what a word or phrase means, they must never use the word that they are explaining in their answer.
8. Before beginning an answer, children must be practised in locating evidence through following directions, skimming, scanning and highlighting the text.
9. The children should also be regularly provided with a variety of answer formats.
